Many people wish that at least some things about their lives were different. In cases in which the fulfillment of such wishes would undermine their loving of people or their valuing of things, is their actual loving and valuing diminished in some way? Are they, in virtue of these wishes, worse partners or parents, worse people, living worse lives? The answer to these questions, perhaps surprisingly, is no. As it turns out, such wishes may be important elements of a good life.